

What would you do with £40,000?

Imagine you're 18 and have £40,000 to spend. Would you invest it in a fabulous deposit for your first house? Splash out on a ticket for the most luxurious round-the-world trip? Indulge your inner entrepreneur and start your own business? Or pay the fees and maintenance costs for a 3-year university degree?

That's the decision thousands of teenagers in England face this week, as they discover if their A level results will lead them to their university of choice – and potentially into significant debt, as very few are actually able to pay that sort of money upfront.

Even if you are lucky enough to have a spare £40k hidden under your mattress, is a university degree really the best option? Leading TEFL (Teaching English as a Foreign Language) course provider i-to-i has done some number crunching to compare a 3-year bachelor's degree in England with a Level 5 TEFL diploma and has come up with some interesting results.

For a fraction of the cost of a degree, you can earn a recognised vocational qualification (equivalent to a foundation degree) that opens the door to jobs all over the world and enables you to start teaching online immediately in this uncertain Covid world.

To make the point, they've pulled the information together into an infographic. You might want to hold onto that £40,000 for a little longer!
